The Friday Superstition.

vortisers.

In Mr. Prector's Sunday evening lecture on he "Religion of Astronomy," he alluded to the prevalent superstition about the il: luck of beginning journeys on Friday, and cited in illustration the delay of a troop ship by order of the British Admiral some years ago out of consideration for the terrors of the sailors. An apter illustration lay close at his hand in the fact that Friday is avoided as the day of departure by all the Atlantic steamers which ply from this port. But Mr. Proctor ventured an assertion about this superstition which admits of doubt. He said that it dated back "four or five thousand years." So erudite a writer as Robert Southey, on the contrary, regards it as Christian and as arising from the crucifixion. If Mr. Proctor has facts to controvert this opinion of the author of "The Doctor" they would be very interesting to the public. The historian Buckle, who de-lighted in that kind of research, seems to rest content with Southey's assertion.

In a considerable mass of material he accumulated about the ill luck of Friday we find no examples cited outside of Christeadom save from the west coast of Africa. The fact that Columbus sailed on a Friday upon his first grand voyage of discovery implies also that it is a superstition of comparatively modern origin. If it had been widely diffused among sailors in his time surely he would himself have avoided adding such a terror wantonly to the exposition, Still further, had such a supersition been known at the Spanish court it is scarcely pos-sible that an express prohibition would not have been laid on him by Queen I sabella agains: defying it. Allusions to the common existence

A PRACTICAL JOKE, -The Retirement of Rear Admiral J. R. Madison Mullany suggests an incident that occurred on the trial trip of the ram Dunderberg in February, 1867. Captain Mullary, on this conssion, was at the head of the naval commission detailed to superiotend the working of the Danderberg's battery of 11 inch and 15-inch gues, the gun practice with shells occupying most of the second day of the trip. Capt. Mullary was the life of the party on board, which numbered about forty exclusive of the crew, and was full of innecent practical jokes as well as humorous anecdotes. While the entire company was at dinner in the ward room Capt. Muliany left the table as the guests were finishing their dessert, and presently there was a terrific explosion and a crash of falling glass, which smashed the crockery on the table, overturned chairs, and sont a number of the guests whirling against the cabin doors. At first it was feared the boilers had exploded, and all was consternation. But presently Capt. Mullany's face, somewhat shaded with apprehension, ap+ peared at the door, and after assuring himself that nobody was hurt, he explained the cause of the cresh. In order to raise a little lively excitement he had ordered one of the 11-inch stern chasers to be loaded with shell and fired. As the gun was trained directly over the ward room, and the missile traversed a course not over three feet from the deck, the shock on the atmosphere dashed in the skylight of heavy thick glass directly over the dining table, with the result above noted. The captain had not calculated the force of the explosion or he would have first put on the heavy oak hatch in-
